HARNESS CHAPTER I SOME VIEWS OF THE INSTITUTION The house a large, plain white building with no architectural pretensions stood on a high swell of the downs and looked across the valley in which Milldean village lay, and thence over rolling stretches of close turf, till the prospect ended in the gleam of waves and the silver-grey mist that lay over the sea. It was a fine, open, free view. The air was fresh, with a touch of salt in it, and made the heat of the sun more than endurable even welcome and nourishing.
Tom Courtland, raising himself from the grass and sitting up straight, gave utterance to what his surroundings declared to be a very natural exclamation: What a bore to leave this and go back to town! Stay a bit longer, old chap, urged his host, Grantley Imason, who lay full length on his back on the turf, with a straw hat over his eyes and nose, and a pipe, long gone out, between his teeth. Back to my wife! Courtland went on, without noticing the invitation. With a faint sigh Grantley Imason sat up, put his hat on his head, and knocked out his pipe. He glanced at his friend with a look of satirical amusement. Youre encouraging company for a man whos just got engaged, he remarked. Its the devil of a business sort of thing some of those fellows would write a book about. But its not worth a book. A page of strong and indiscriminate swearing thats what its worth, Grantley. Grantley sighed again as he searched for his tobacco-pouch. The sigh seemed to hover doubtfully between a faint sympathy and a resigned boredom. And no end to it none in sight! I dont know whether its legal cruelty to throw library books and so on at your husbands head Depends on whether you ever hit him, I should think; and theyd probably conclude a woman never would. But what an ass I should look if I went into court with that sort of story! Yes, you would look an ass, Grantley agreed. Doesnt she give you well, any other chance, you know? Not she! My dear fellow, shes most aggressively the other way. Then why dont you give her a chance? What, you mean? Am I so very cryptic? murmured Grantley as he lit his pipe. Im a Member of Parliament. Yes, I forgot. Thats a bit awkward. Besides, there are the children. I dont want my children to think their father a scoundrel. He paused, and added grimly: And I dont want them to be left to their mothers bringing-up either.
