

Long Metal Pieces (Impetus of Thought)

Existence is only known by those that live, and to live one must learn, one must feel and sometimes dissolve. Charles Sheriton once adhered to this concept and tried his best to improve himself. Unfortunately, learning was a difficult task for him. Thrown about by so many wishes, he made the sad attempt at going to university, and when he was proven not only an inadequate student, but an inadequate thinker, he left, but in doing so, created a relentless history waiting eagerly for his return. More than fifteen years after leaving the university, Charles and a number of other commuters are stranded on the Transit Train traveling back to that very same institution. At first, the time inside the car is only inconvenient and seems to be a random event. As the hours persist, and Charles starts to see how indeterminate he is, and because of constrained nature of their environment, the other passengers begin to lose their various virtues, and succumb to the very same anxieties Charles is fostering. Toward the end of this prolonged moment in time, Charles is overwhelmed by himself, and what he means to others. Through this connection, he tries very hard to annihilate anything that is attached to him. Due to this, a chain reaction is set into motion, causing various impossibilities to pull themselves out of the air and become real. In doing this, in performing a miracle, of giving birth to so many new realities, some of the weaker members within the group held inside the train collapse within themselves, thereby causing death and destruction.
