Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: ... the jury, find the accused guilty of an attempt to commit manslaughter, but earnestly recommend him to the mercy of the court, believing that the higher penalties inflicted for the actual committal of such offenses would be more severe than the circumstances attending the case would require. The court asked the jury if they found the accused not guilty of an assault and battery with intent to kill and murder, and found him guilty of an assault in the attempt to commit manslaughter,<sup>1</sup> to which they responded, without being polled, in the affirmative, and the verdict was entered in accordance with this verbal response. Afterwards appellant moved to have the first verdict entered as rendered. The court overruled the motion, and the defendant excepted, and this court said (page 311): The entry in the record is in accordance with the ascertained views of the jury, and it was competent to make such inquiry as would enable it to comprehend the will and intention of the jury in reference to their finding, when, in the opinion of the court, there was any doubt or uncertainty in the language employed by them. The thing to be ascertained is the will and intention of the jury in their finding. That is what the court should know, that the proper sentence of the law may follow upon their actual finding, not upon what is not their actual finding. Of course the legal effect of the verdict in this case, in the words used, is, by legal construction, death. But the words employed in a verdict are the mere vehicles for conveying the jurys will; and where there are words in the verdict raising an apparent cloud<sup>1</sup> as to what the actual intent and rinding of the jury is, the court, whether asked or not, should dis...
