

The Mind the Paint Girl(Annotated)

THE FIRST ACT The scene is a drawing-room, prettily but somewhat showily decorated. The walls are papered with a design representing large clusters of white and purple lilac. The furniture is covered with a chintz of similar pattern, and the curtains, carpet, and lamp-shades correspond. In the wall facing the spectator are two windows, and midway between the windows there is the entrance to a conservatory. The conservatory, which is seen beyond, is of the kind that is built out over the portico of a front-door, and is plentifully stocked with flowers and hung with a velarium and green sun-blinds. In the right-hand wall there is another window and, nearer the spectator, a console-table supporting a high mirror; and in the wall on the left, opposite the console-table, there is a double-door opening into the room, the further half of which only is used. In the entrance to the conservatory, to the right, there is a low, oblong tea-table at which are placed three small chairs; and near-by, on the left, are a grand-piano and a music-stool. Against the piano there is a settee, and on the extreme left, below the door, there is an arm-chair with a little round table beside it. At the right-hand window in the wall at the back is another settee, and facing this window and settee there is a smaller arm-chair. Not far from the fire-place there is a writing-table with a telephone-instrument upon it. A chair stands at the writing-table, its back to the window in the wall on the right; and in front of the table, opposing the settee by the piano, there is a third settee. On the left of this settee, almost in the middle of the room, is an arm-chair; and closer to the settee, on its right, are two more arm-chairs. Other articles of furniture-- a cabinet, occasional chairs, etc., etc.-- occupy spaces against the walls. On the piano, on the console-table and cabinet, on the settee at the back, on the round table, and upon the floor, stand huge baskets of flowers, and other handsome floral devices in various forms, with cards attached to them; and lying higgledy-piggledy upon the writing-table are a heap of small packages, several little cases containing jewellery, and a litter of paper and string. The packages and the cases of jewellery are also accompanied by cards or letters. A fierce sunlight streams down upon the velarium, and through the green blinds, in the conservatory. [Note: Throughout, right and left are the spectators right and left, not the actors.] [LORD FARNCOMBE, his gloves in his hand, is seated in the arm-chair in the middle of the room. He is a simple-mannered, immaculately dressed young man in his early twenties, his bearing and appearance suggesting the soldier. He rises expectantly as GLADYS, a flashy parlourmaid in a uniform, shows in LIONEL ROPER, a middle-aged individual of the type of the second-class City man. ROPER. [To FARNCOMBE.] Hul-lo! Im in luck! Just the chap Im hunting for. [Shaking hands with FARNCOMBE.] How dye do, Lord Farncombe? FARNCOMBE. How are you, Roper? GLADYS. [To ROPER, languidly.] Ill tell Mrs. Upjohn youre here. ROPER. Ta. [GLADYS withdraws.] Phew, its hot! FARNCOMBE. Miss Parradells out. ROPER. [Taking off his gloves.] She wont be long, I dare say. FARNCOMBE. Ive brought her a few flowers. ROPER. Have you? Ive sent her a trifle of jewellery. FARNCOMBE. [Glancing at the writing-table.] She seems to have received a lot of jewellery. ROPER. [Bustling across to the table.] By Jove, doesnt she! Ah, theres my brooch! FARNCOMBE. [Modestly.] I didnt consider Id a right to offer her anything but flowers, on so slight an acquaintance. ROPER. Exactly; but Im an old friend, you know. [Turning to FARNCOMBE.] Perhaps, by her next birthday---- FARNCOMBE. [Smiling.] I hope so. ROPER. [Approaching FARNCOMBE and taking him by the lapel of his coat.] What I want to say to you is, doing anything to-night? FARNCOMBE. I-- I
