Not illustrated. 1864 Excerpt: ... No. Well, will you bet about it? Willingly. What will you bet? Whatever you like. Well, then, if you win you shall nibble my ears; for you cannot eat me; and if you lose I will eat you: will that suit you? Perfectly. Then set off; for I will give you a start. While the hare began to browse the snail set off at his slow pace, and went to his brother, who was a little way off, and to him he communicated a pass--word, which he in turn told to another, and so on along the whole line which the betters had to travel, so that it quickly reached the end. Soon the hare, having satisfied his hunger, and feeling strong, set off, and flew over the ground, calling to the snail, whom he believed to be close by. Ohel answered he, from a long way off. Oh, he is already far on the way, cried the hare, who set off again like an arrow. In a few minutes he stopped and called again: Ohe, answered a voice still farther on. Really, he goes very quickly, thought the hare, and he set off again. A quarter of an hour after, he stopped, quite out of breath. Now, said he, I may rest; I must be far in advance; but I will call and see. Ohe! snail. Ohel replied a voice a long way on. Oh! I must be quick; I shall lose my bet, murmured the hare. He ran, and ran, and at last stopped, quite exhausted, only a few yards from the fields. Snail, cried he, faintly: what! you are returning from the place? Unfortunate that I am, I have lost my bet; and he made vain efforts to get up and escape, b...
